IPSE (in comic writers, ipsus; by way of climax, we also find Supert., ipsissimus (like αὐτότατος), i. e. the self-same, the very name, Plaut.), a, um; genit., ipsius (poet., ipsius) (formed from is and the postfix pse, i. e. the Greek σφι). He himself (hence, originally, they said, more correctly, eapse, eampse, for ipssa, ipssam), self, in his, &c., own person, personally. I. Gen. A) ego i. cum eodem ipso erraverim, Cic.; i. veni, come thyself, Ov.; i. (he himself) ad bellum profectus, Cæs.; navis tantum jactura facta, ioculomes i. (she crew itself) evaserunt, Liv.

—B) It is likewise emphatic when speaking of a principal person; thus, for example, the master or mistress of a house, a preceptor, &c., are called ipse or ipsa (our he, she, when a stress is laid on the words); e. g. ipas, the mistress, ego eo, quo me ipa misit, Plaut.; suam corat ipsam (mistress) tam bene, quam puella matrem, Catull.; ipse dixit (Greek αὐτός ἔφα), he has said so, i. e. the (i. q. our) master, which was the usual formula observed by the disciples of Pythagoras in speaking of their teacher, Cic.—C) et i. (like καὶ αὐτός), Also himself, he likewise or too; when a predicate refers to two or more subjects: victor ex Æquis i. Volscos transiit et ipso bellum molientes, who were on their part also preparing for war, Liv.; qui et i. crus fregerat, who had also (like the others) broken his leg, Suet.—II. Esp. A) 1) It is used, moreover, for making an object prominent in comparison with another of minor importance: The very, the true, the identical, eaque i. causa belli fuit, and that was the very cause of the war, Liv. Sometimes ipse by itself is used instead of is ipse: The or that one exactly, just the one or that one, ego ex ipsius (just or precisely from his virtue) virtute voluptatum cepi, Cic.

2) Esp., for the exact definition of time or number: Just, exactly, triginta erant dies i., just thirty days, Cic.; sub ipsa profectioe, at the very moment of departure, Cæs.; hence, nunc ipsum, just now.—B) Even himself, very, in his ipsius rebus, Cic.—C) Because nobody can be considered a free agent who acts under foreign influence; hence, Of himself, &c., of (her, &c.) own accord, for his (her, &c.) own part, valvæ se i. speruerunt, Cic.; animus i. ægrotus, Ter. With sponte, Liv.—D) 1) Because the word "self" excludes any other individual; hence, By himself (herself, &c.), alone (like the Greek αὐτός for μόνος): his actis, aliud genitor secum i. volutat, Virg.; lectica plena ipso, with his person alone, Juv. Hence, 2) i. per se (αὐτός καθ' αὐτόν), and simply i.: In or of him self, itself, &c., per se ipsa maxima est, Cic.; ignorantia rerum, e qua ipsa (of itself) horribiles existunt sæpe formidines, Id.—E) Instead of the reflexive, in order to make the reference to the object more emphatic, esp. in an antithesis: quem si parum pudor ipsius defendebat (his own), Cic.; Jugurtha legatos ad Metellum mittit, qui ipsi (for him) liberissime vitam peterent, Sall.

NĒ, adv. Not; it is used only as a conditional or dependent subjective negation, i. e. where only the conception of a thing is negated, but its actual existence is left undetermined; while non denotes an absolute objective negation, i. e. the denying of the existence of a thing. I. In conditional or dependent clauses: ne sit sane summum malum dolor, supposing it not to be the greatest evil, Cic.; ne fuerit, there may not have been, Id.—II. With independ- ent clauses, which contain a command, prayer, demand, &c., in which case ne begins the sentence or clause.—A) With an imperative: ne jura, do not swear, Plaut.; ne crucia, Ter.; mortuum in urbe no sepelito neve urito, Cic.—B) With a subjunctive expressing command: ne fiant isti viginti dies, Ter.; ne conferas culpam in me, Id.—C) Expressing a wish, prayer, or the like: ne sim salvus, Cic.; ne vivam, may I not live, Id.; ne id Jupiter sineret, Liv.; utinam ue, oh that—not! Ter.—III. With other particles: dum ne, provided that not, as long as not, while not, Cic.; modo ne, provided only that not: ne... quidem, not even: in which case the emphatic word is placed between these two particles, e.g. ne in oppidis quidem, Cic.; ne mulieribus quidem, Cæs.; sometimes a negative word precedes, without destroying the negation: non enim præterendum ne id quidem, Cic.; numquam, ne mediocri quidem cuiquam, Id.; in the sense of "I will not say," "not to mention!" ne connivente quidem sed etiam... oculis intente, Cic.—IV. Put for modo ne, only not: ne illis sanguinem nostrum largiantur, Sall.—V. Put for nedum, much less, to say nothing of: ne vero nihil istorum, ne juvenem quidem movit umquam: ne nunc senem, Cic.—VI. Denoting purpose: That not, in order that not, lest: id egi, ne interesset, Cic.; ne dicam, that I may not say, i. e. not to say, id, Ne, in connection with ut, is, properly speaking, a pleonasm, not differing perceptibly from ne alone, except that it chiefly occurs in solemn discourse, and hence especially in laws. It is sometimes placed apart from ut, but always immediately before the word which it particularly bears upon: præcipiendum est igitur ut... ne existimant, that they may not believe, Cic.; ut hoc ne facerem, that I should not do this on any consideration, Ter.—VII. Expressing a prohibition. A) After verbs which express fear, anxiety, danger, &c., where we use that without a negative; there is always, as the foundation of this form of expression, a wish that the thing may be so or may not occur: vereor ne hoc fiat, I apprehend that it may happen (but I wish it may not): metuebant ne indicarent, Cic.; hic, ne quid mihi proregetur, horreo, Id.; also after substantives which imply the idea of fear, anxiety, &c.: periculum est, ne necasio detur, Nep.; in all these cases, that not or lest is expressed by ne or ut: veritus ne hostium impetum sustinere non posset, Cæs.; vereor ne exercitum firmum habere non possit, Cic.—B) After verbs denoting fear, foresight, or caution: cave ne studeas, Ter.; cave ne cupias, Id.; videat consul ne quid detrimenti capiat republicas, Cic.; also denoting to see, look into, examine, consider whether perhaps, &c.: videmus ne beata vita effici posset, Cic.—C) After certain verbs denoting negation; esp. after those which signify to deny or answer negatively, to refuse, to hinder: casus quidem ne facerem impedit, hindered my doing it, Cic.; Decii corpus ne inveniretur nox quaerentes oppressit, the night hindered us being found, Liv.; unus ne caperetur urbs causa fuit, was the sole cause that hindered the capture of the town, Id.

NE [in poetry we often find it apocopated: egon', viden', for egone, videsne]. As an interrogative particle, enclitic. I. In a simple interrogation, directly interrogatory, with an indicative: videturne hoc tibi verum esse? does this (indeed) appear to you true? Cic.; and also with a subjunctive: putarene umquam accidere posse, ut? can you suppose that? Id.—II. In a double or complex interrogation, when it takes after the interrogatory particles an, nonne, nec ne; in a direct question: Romamne venio, an hic maneo, an Arpinum fugiam? Cic. honestumne factu an turpe? Id.; ne is sometimes used in the second question for an: justitiene prius miror bellicæ laborum, Virg. If the second question contains simply a negation without a verb, this is expressed by annon: isne est quem quero, annon, Ter. If the second question contains simply a negation without a verb, this is expressed by an non or nec ne: roga velintne annon uxorem? Ter.; nescio tun' scias an non? Plaut. The poets sometimes join ne to words to which it does not belong: scamnum faceretne Prispum, a bench or a Priopus, Hor.; this ne is also frequently appended to other words, e.g. to the pronouns qui, quæ, quod, Plaut.; also to quia, Virg.
